Ethnocultural identity and psychological distress in university students

Featuring:

Paul Boonmak
PhD Candidate, Public Health Sciences

Paul Boonmak is currently a PhD candidate in Epidemiology at the Department of Public Health Sciences at Queen's University. His thesis and interests are in different ethnocultural factors—mainly cultural identity clarity and ethnocultural groups—and their associations with psychological distress and perception of mental illness. Although etiological in nature, the results provide useful approaches to mental healthcare policies and service provisions in the post-secondary settings, or a culturally diverse community setting.
